You have a charged particle moving through a velocity selector that uses perpendicular electric and magnetic fields. If  $a$  is even, then the particle is a proton; if  $a$  is odd, then the particle is an electron. At the beginning, the particle is moving North at a speed of  $(m)$  km/s through a magnetic field that has a magnitude of  $(b/100)$  T. If  $b$  is even, then the magnetic field points UP; if  $b$  is ...

When  $\mu > 1$  (or  $\chi > 0$ ) the magnetic field can be thought of as "concentrated" relative to that in a vacuum and the substance is called paramagnetic. When  $\mu < 1$  (or  $\chi < 0$ ) the field can be considered relatively "thinned" or "dispersed" and the substance is called diamagnetic. These concepts will be covered in much more detail in subsequent questions.
